Carbon is the most flexible of the materials and offers designers huge scope to tailor the way the bike rides, they also aren't limited by tube shape, with aero road bikes being a good example of this versatility, like this Trek Madone. Carbon fibre frames aren't all equal, though. There's a huge difference between cheap and expensive carbon fibre, down to the type of fibres used, how it's manufactured and other important factors that make a big impact. Buy carbon if you want the lightest and stiffest road bike money can buy, or because you want to go aero. Read more: Great road bikes for under Â£1,000. I don't know anybody with a sob story about carbon. Cracked aluminium frame yes but carbon no. I bought my first carbon framed mtb from Koga Miyata (Skyrunner) in 1995.
